Codependency does NOT mean you 're just really nice and helpful. Nowadays people tend to throw the word around like a frisbee, but real codependency does not simply mean you 're extremely kindhearted and willing to do things for other people. It means crossing the line between healthy interdependence and help that hurts. A codependent 's " help " usually involves anxiety, discomfort, and feeling out of control, because the motivation behind the help isn 't just for the sake of helping ...

Codependency gets thrown around a lot when it comes to relationships, often to the dismay of clinical psychologists and relationship therapists. Because while the majority of us view codependency as a negative term that suggests a person is overbearing and needy, some experts believe the term is overused and really isn't all that bad.

Here's what it means to be codependent, and why it's not a

Codependency is a behavioral condition in a relationship where one person enables another person's addiction, poor mental health, immaturity, irresponsibility, or underachievement. Among the core characteristics of codependency is an excessive reliance on other people for approval and a sense of identity. Definitions of codependency vary, but it is generally defined as a subclinical, situational, and/or episodic behavioral condition similar to that of dependent personality disorder. The term is
