Crystal orientation In general. the infrared radiation incident on a sample is partially polarised so that the relative intensities of absorption bands may alter as a crystalline sample is rotated.

The four bending vibrations of CH₂ groups are scissoring, rocking, wagging, and twisting. The scissoring mode of the CH₂ group gives rise to a characteristic band near 1465 cm⁻¹ in IR and Raman spectra. The rocking, wagging, and twisting appear in the region of 1422 – 719 cm⁻¹.

The characteristic group frequencies of both IR and Raman spectroscopy are complementary and their respective strengths and weaknesses are discussed for various functional groups. Using both techniques may provide confirmation of the presence of particular functional groups or provide additional information.
