Finally, even assuming some unforeseen need for captive-origin lions in reintroductions arises in future, we see no acceptable role for so-called pre-release training (ALERT, 2008, Lion Encounter, 2011) that demands close contact between people and tame lions. Any credible attempt to reintroduce captive cats includes stringent safeguards against socializing animals to humans.

Visitors to Lion Encounter pay roughly $130 for a "lion walk", while taking part in a volunteer program costs thousands of dollars per week. Many of the visitors to Lion Encounter, particularly the volunteers, go there believing that they are doing something good for the lions.

Walking With Lions: Con Or Conservation?

Yes you can take a trip to Fathala in Senegal,it's more a rather large wildlife park more like Longleat in the UK and no where near as large as the reserve's that they have in South Africa.And yes you can walk with lions' and they are fully grown lions and all that you have to protect yourself is a stick.Although we have been to Fathala we have not done this walk as they were not there when we went and am not too sure how safe it really is,they are after all wild animals and are unpredictable.

Walking with the Lions - the lions are not in the worst condition and they look well cared for, however they are still very much in a confined space. We had a 'prep talk' before - ie don't shout, don't scream etc. You then walk behind them, stop tale photos, walk some more, take photos. It is all staged.

The problem is that once the lions reach a certain age they are no longer good for lion walks, so more cubs are born from the poor females used as breeding stock to replace them, and these older lions are then penned up in seriously overcrowded conditions with little to no food and no care whatsoever. Many of them die.
